The main market in Kochi which is also a well-known tourist destination is the Mattancherry market, named after the small Hindu temple and which is the biggest wholesale market in Kerala. Paddy, palm oil, spices, clothes and footwear are other items which are sold here. The Kochi temple town of Fort Kochi, the hub of Indian tourism in the state, is a real foodie's delight. The state of Kerala, located on the country's eastern tip, is the most densely populated in India. It is a predominantly Muslim-majority state, although a small percentage of the population also follows Hinduism. The economy of the state is based on traditional industries such as textiles and agriculture. The most popular example of this type of dish is prawn kala chawal, a dish made of ground prawns, lentils, and a green chili spice paste and cooked with vegetables. Rice is considered the staple food in Kerala. Varieties of rice include, but are not limited to, rice with red lentils, rice with black-eyed peas, and brown basmati rice. The Kerala government has taken measures to improve the physical and mental health of its citizens and for the first time Kerala has entered the WHO's global list of 20 low-carbon-emission states. Kerala has also taken measures to secure its strategic location as a source of natural wealth. Kerala is the only state in India to be endowed with an extensive mangrove forest on its coast and it is the only state where both mangroves and coastal beaches are protected under one law. It is also the only state where the collector of coir (a natural fibre extracted from the coconut husk) is the chief conservator of forests, a unique feature of Kerala.
